DIVISION OF COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

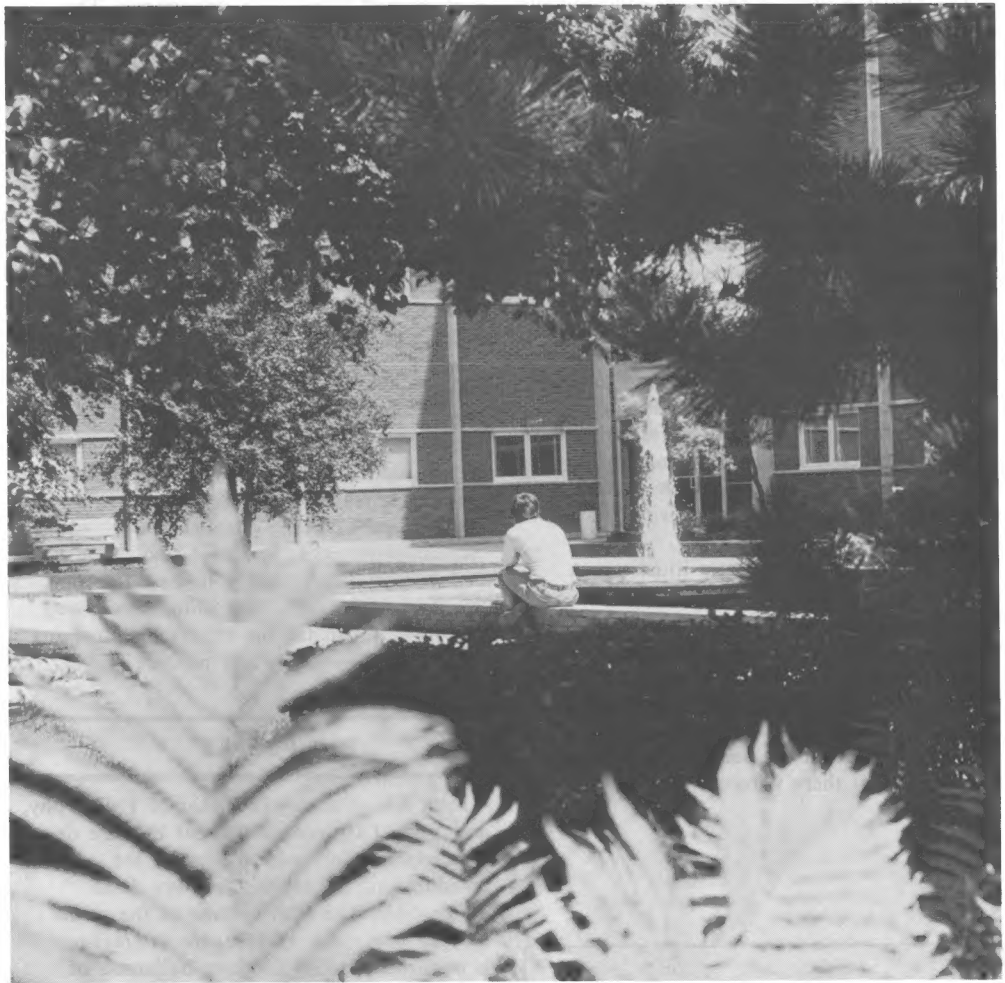

The popular belief that man is an economic animal that need only be given a place to make money (because money carries with it all good things in life) leads to frontier-style new towns like Grande Cache, where the pay is high but alcoholism, divorce, and violence are just facts of life. And when cities are conceived as purely organic, the death of the inner city seems natural; the terrifying barbarism in some older parts of New York City is just a sign of the atrophy of one small part of the vast being.

Neither the sterile company town ("There's nothing to spend your money on here but booze.") nor the over-ripe cores of large cities ("This place is a jungle. If you can't put up a fight, you can lose everything.") are environments conducive to living well. Nor do miles of similar suburban streets or highrise canyons seem immediately appealing. For innumerable reasons much of mankind dwells in surroundings that, given a choice, one would prefer not to visit, let alone live in.

But, man is adaptable, and he will continue to adapt "down" as long as he feels he doesn't have a hope of adapting "up." What we need to remember is that our environments can be changed, too, and that there are people who can help us to make our settlements more congenial.

The Division of Community Development offers an interdisciplinary graduate program for students who want to learn to work with members of a community for its improvement. Human settlements go back thousands of years; Community Development goes back about ten. Settlements have long been shaped, in so far as they have been shaped at all, according to an overriding principle—geographic necessity, 'divine' pattern, industrial function—or an urge to display—wealth, piety, might. In fact, rarely has the heterogenous nature of a community been planned for.

At the UN Habitat Conference, Margaret Mead asserted that had women been designing ancient, primitive settlements they would have chose to live near water, while the headmen, those with authority, generally chose positions of natural defence, regardless of the proximity to water. G.A. Eyford, who has been Director of the Division of Community Development since 1970, puts it succinctly: "They say that participatory democracy doesn't work. I say it has never been tried."

One of the more important things that students of Community Development learn, then, is to help to guide community members to enlightened decisions about their future. The graduates are, in Dr. Eyford's words, "facilitators, questioners, analyzers, probers." They are the people who can help a community decide, for example, whether it wants a new industry to be built within its boundaries. They are trained to draw out the implications of change for a community, to provide for beneficial changes and against detrimental changes.

Obviously, communities throughout the world vary immensely. The Division, recognizing this, has an international scope (and international students). But how do students discern the common factors among settlements, and how do they learn to apply the principles of the social sciences to such a huge variety of settlements?

For one thing, of course, they learn to work with communities, foremost; for another, they are "sensitized to all the factors that can affect a community—geography, religion, culture, economics, and so on." And they are trained to think of themselves as problem-solvers, not as people who know the answers, but as people who can find the answers.

They also go through one of the most rigorous programs at the University. It includes six full courses, some designed for the Division, some in areas of personal interest (such as Adult Education, Rural Sociology, History), a thesis, and field work, which gives them the practical experience of working with the community at hand.

The Division itself is primarily educationally oriented. Students come first. It has only two full-time staff members and two associates, both of whom are with Sociology. Although it has only a master's-level program now, Dr. Eyford feels that it will eventually gain a PhD-level program, as well, partly because the discipline demands it and partly because it is the only such program in Canada, and students will want to do doctoral studies in an area that is likely to become increasingly important as community problems become increasingly glaring.

Dr. Eyford's own background is, oddly, English literature. Were the Division to gain another course, he relishes the idea of its being one in which literature is studied. He feels that, other than the view gained by being there in person, imaginative literature can offer the best vision of a living community.

Fiction, in fact, frequently illustrates a theme that runs through Community Development: human development and community development are virtually inseparable, for it is the rarest person who can live happily apart. It is refreshing to find in a study that could, one feels, rely heavily on the drier side of the social sciences the realization that there is more to living well than social indicators can tell, and that the practice of poll-taking will not entirely substitute for discussion as a means of reaching consensus.

Futurologists would no doubt agree that community development actively pursued by members of communities and their governments and community development as a study will increase in importance. The University should be proud to have encouraged an idea whose time, when the Division of Community Development was initiated, had not yet come.

VISITORS

■ Akihiro Yoshida, Associate Professor in the Faculty of Education, University of Tokyo, will be a visitor in the Faculty of Education for the months of July and August. While here, he will be associated with members of the Faculty with particular interest in instructional research. He is also completing a book which is a critical analysis of the implicit assumptions underlying current research in teaching and learning. Dr. Yoshida is a founding member of the "Kyojugakukenyu-No-Kai" (Association for Pedagogical Research). A leading figure in this Association is Kihaku Saito, who is well known in Japan for his efforts in reforming instructional research and practice.

PEOPLE

■ John King-Farlow, Professor of Philosophy, and Yvon Lafrance, professeur titulaire de philosophie, Université d'Ottawa, are co-editors of the series L'univers de la philosophie. The fifth volume of the series has just come out: Philosophie au Québec is published by Les Editions Bellarmia of Montreal and Desclée of Paris-Tournai.

■ Madeleine J. Monod, Professor of Secondary Education, has returned from Jonquière, Québec, where she participated in the French immersion program held there for three weeks. She directed research on a functional placement test as well as on the usefulness of cognates in developing reading rapidity and understanding in French.

■ Allison Connell, Professor of French, participated in the Annual Convention of l'Association des professeurs de français des universités canadiennes held in Fredericton in May. He gave a paper entitled "La situation de Valéry Larbaud critique: domaine français" on Larbaud as a critic of French literature during the literary movement of the twenties.

■ Yar Slavutych, Associate Professor of Slavic Languages, delivered a paper on "Russification of the Ukrainian vocabulary" at the annual meeting of the Harvard Ukrainian Research Institute. On his way home from this meeting, he delivered a talk on I. Franko's poetics at the literary Club Kozub in Toronto.

■ Manoly R. Lupul, Professor of Educational Foundations and Director of the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, was invited to present a paper to the Third World Congress of Comparative Education Societies held in London, England, from 27 June to 2 July. Dr. Lupul's paper was entitled "Multiculturalism and educational policies in Canada."

■ Alexander Matejko, Professor of Sociology, presented a paper on motivation and job enrichment at the Second Conference on Blue Collar Workers and Their Communities held at the University of Western Ontario.

■ John G. Paterson of the Department of Educational Psychology is one of three editors for a new international journal, International Journal for the Advancement of Counselling, to be introduced by Martinus Nijhoff Publishers in 1978. Contributions to the journal are welcomed from authors throughout the world; in 1978, Dr. Paterson will be the contributor from Canada.
